ST.PETERSBURG

Kazan Cathedral (Entrance) Traveling through Europe, imperator Pavel Petrovich, was struck by the beauty and harmony of the Cathedral of St. Peter's in Rome and the square in front of it, surrounded by colonnades. In 1799, when he was come back to Russian Capital, St-Petersburg, he announced a competition to design the cathedral, which would replace the dilapidated church of the Nativity of the Virgin (popularly known as Kazan), built earlier on the same place. The church houses one of the most important relics of Russia - the miraculous icon of Our Lady of Kazan. The main condition of the competition was that the future temple will be similar to St-Peter's Cathedral in Rome. Of all the works presented he have approved the project of the young talented architect Andrei Voronikhin. Cathedral on the Blood (Entrance) (official name Church of the Resurrection) began to build in 1883 on the very spot where the bomb was blast in March 1, 1881. Ignatius Grinevitsky was mortally wounded Tsar Alexander II. The day after this tragic event was erected a wooden chapel, but from different provinces of the donations for the monument began to arrive in large numbers, and it was decided to build a temple. It was build within 24 years old, from 1883 to 1907.
